Nation's Report Card Shows Little Progress in Reading and Math-Except On This Measure

Although the nation's eighth graders show a slight improvement in reading, their math scores remain basically unchanged since 2015, according to results released April 10 on the National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP), also known as the Nation's Report Card. Fourth-grade scores in reading and math also remain flat since 2015. Education observers seized on the flat scores and achievement gaps that failed to narrow. There is, however, one important component of NAEP that has improved over the years: a decrease in the percentage of students who score at NAEP's lowest achievement level, "below basic."

Homework Gap Report Reveals Digital Equity Issues

The new Institute of Education Sciences (IES) report on student access to digital learning resources outside the classroom shows that inequities in digital access persist, especially for students of color and students from low-income families. In edscoop, All4Ed's Chip Slaven explained that "there are gaps in broadband access among children making it harder for them to learn at the same level as other students."
